The sheriff was shot once and died instantly when he entered an apartment occupied by Sprague and Mrs. Sprague after the woman had telephoned the sheriff that she was in danger of being killed by her husband.

As Bosler entered the door, gun in hand, Sprague fired once. The sheriff fell, shot through the heart, returning the fire but missing Sprague. The latter surrendered to other officers and was taken to jail.

Sprague had barricaded the door of the apartment and held off city policemen until the arrival of Bosler.

EVANGELIST APPEALS TO K. K. K. FOR SUPPORT

(U. N. S. Dispatch)

Los Angeles, Oct. 11—Appealing to the KuKlux Klan for support, Aimee Semple McPherson went to court today for the beginning of the third week of her unprecedented preliminary hearing. The evangelist, her mother and Mrs. Lorraine Wiseman-Sellaff of San Francisco, are charged with conspiring to produce false testimony.

Distributing cards to her congregation which testify to the signer's unwavering faith in the integrity of the Angelus temple pastor, Mrs. McPherson said: "How many of you are member of the klan. Take several hundred cards with you to the meetings and get signers."

Mention of the klan as a potential source of strength confirmed earlier indications that the evangelist centers her defense about a charge of a "religious-frame-up." When District Attorney Joe Ryan and Captain of Detectives Herman Cline discovered that Kenneth Ormiston, former radioman employed at Mrs. McPherson's Angelus temple, had spent ten days in a Carmel by the Sea cottage with a woman resembling the evangelist at a time when the pastor claimed she was kidnapped, Mrs. McPherson answered the charge by declaring Ryan and Cline were "Catholics persecuting a Protestant minister."

Again during the questioning of Miss Agnes Callahan, a prosecution witness, who testified that she had seen a man, identified by her as Ormiston, enter a hotel room regularly rented by the evangelist, Defense Attorney Gilbert made an unsuccessful effort to introduce into the record the fact that Miss Callahan is a Catholic.

AMERICAN PRESIDENTS

Of our thirty presidents of the United States, the simplest induction to office any president ever had was that of our present President, Calvin Coolidge, following the untimely death of Warren G. Harding. In a little farm house, deep in the Vermont hills, under the beams of an oil lamp, the greatest ruler of the world was sworn into office by his father, a mere notary public, and in the presence of a handful of people. It was also found that, when Calvin Coolidge was called from his bed at midnight in the little Vermont farmhouse to take the oath of office that while there was no lack of a Bible, the precise wording of the presidential oath was not known. Hasty messages were sent to Washington and the text of the oath was forwarded by the Secretary of State. It reads: "I do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will faithfully execute the office of President of the United States and will to the best of my ability, preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States." This oath was taken in the presence of only a handful of people, yet not a single American challenged the right of Calvin Coolidge to occupy the exalted office of President.

Nothing better illustrates the Democracy of the American people than the fact that at the time Mr. Coolidge assumed his great office his son Calvin was working as a common laborer on a farm near Northampton at a wage of $3.50 the day. And the lad continued at his humble task as if events had not transpired to make him one of the most interesting and most talked about youth in the world.

Writing to the President has become much more general in recent years than formerly. It is said that during the Grant administration, business was so dull that the Executive office staff used to play croquet on the White House lawn during the hours between the mail deliveries. But now there is probably no other official in the world receiving more letters than the President of the United States. Often the letter-writing is stimulated by jokes which the Washington correspondents sometimes commit upon the President. When Mr. Roosevelt first proclaimed his celebrated anti-race doctrine, some humorous writer sent out a story to the effect that the President had received 28 baby carriages. It was published broadcast and hundreds of poor families wrote him for the carriage.

It is a fact that so many persons send gifts to the Presidents that he frequently receives large numbers of duplicates. It was reported at the time President Taft celebrated his silver wedding anniversary that he received more than 200 sugar bowls and duplicates of other silver articles in proportion.

The most notable gifts which President Wilson received were given when he was in Europe negotiating the Peace Treaty. The city of Rome presented him with a solid gold statuette of Romulus and Remus with Wolfe. It stood about 5 inches high and was valued at many thousands of dollars. The city of Genoa presented him with a marble bust of Columbus, and other cities, kings, organizations, and individuals presented him with gifts. On his return some members of congress questioned his right to accept these because the constitution forbids an American official accepting gains from foreign Governments or princes. The matter finally was dropped, the gifts being regarded as personal.

Mr. Harding received many gifts during the years of his Presidency, most of them being pictures and books and articles of adornment. At the time of his death three rooms in the White House were filled with them and two weeks were required in packing and crating them for shipment to Marion.

The first gift that President Coolidge accepted was a dog that was sent to him by a friend in Boston.

The constant stream of callers and the heavy routine of business make the heaviest demands upon the time of the President. During the first three or four weeks of his administration, he received large numbers of friends and supporters who came to congratulate him. These numbers have run as high as 20,000 to 30,000 in the first month. It was said that during the two years and five months of the Harding administration, approximately 250,000 people called on the President. Unless the President learns the trick of gripping the visitor's hand, before the visitor grips him, he is certain to have a badly swollen arm. President Roosevelt was one of the greatest handshakers and was a past-master in the art.

The President may transact the business of his office at any place he may select and there is nothing to prevent his spending the major portion of his time elsewhere than in Washington. Congress once asked President Grant to advise it as to what part of his duties were performed outside the District of Columbia. He replied in a polite note that it was none of Congress' business.

Never since then has the right been questioned.

There is nothing in the constitution which prohibits the President from going beyond the borders of the United States, but Mr. Cleveland was the first President to do so. On a fishing trip he went beyond the 3-mile limit. But such an excursion as this fades into insignificance when compared with the two trips which President Wilson made to Europe or the late President Harding's tour to Alaska.

The President of the United States is the most photographed person in the world. Washington photographers as well as the great commercial photograph companies of other American cities and of foreign lands take thousands of pictures of the Chief Executive. The President is almost as frequently a subject for the motion-picture camera as for the still camera. The first historic films ever made were of President McKinley's inauguration.

Many such films were made during President Roosevelt's period in the office. Still and movie photographers are stationed at the White House not only to avail themselves of every opportunity to take the President but also to photograph distinguished visitors. No famous person can step out of the White House without being asked to pause a moment for the movie men and the snapshot artists. One Washington firm alone has more than 1,500 negatives of the late President Harding.

The usual inauguration is one of the finest governmental spectacles in the world. In recent years the ceremony has been greatly simplified, but it is possible that the former splendors may be revived. At the time of the inauguration of President Harding, he forbade any display on the ground that it was unbecoming at a time when hundreds of thousands of Americans were temporarily out of employment and needy. The Harding inauguration in consequence was the simplest in recent years.

In earlier days as many as 30,000 men marched in an inaugural parade and 200,000 visitors came to Washington to witness the event. It is said of the crowd which attended the first inauguration of Jackson that it was a "multitude too many to be fed with out a miracle, and that it seemed that the whole nation rushed to the Capital." That "multitude" was about 80,000 people. The first inaugural ball occurred when James Madison came into office. The crowd which attended was estimated at 400.

Provision was made for 15,000 at the Taft inaugural ball. This gay event, formerly looked forward to with eager anticipation, also has been abandoned in the recent years.

Neither President Wilson nor President Harding authorized the holding of inaugural balls and, unless some President soon revives the old custom, it is in danger of being considered too long dead ever again to be made part of the inauguration festivities.

Although one of the richest men of his time, George Washington had to borrow $3,000 to defray his expenses to New York where his inauguration took place. When he arrived at the Federal Hall it was found that there was no Bible in the building and an attendance saved the day by getting one from a Masonic lodge room nearby.

John Adams wrote after his inauguration that there was more weeping when he took the oath of office than he had ever witnessed at a tragedy, but whether it was from the loss of a beloved President or the accession of an unpopular one, he could not say. It was said that Adams cherished a secret ambition to be king, not President. (Continued on Page Three)

Lusitania Still Cruising

Every once in a while you will read in the newspaper that some treasure-seeking expedition is about to raise the Lusitania. But you never hear it has been raised. A French salvage expert holds the opinion that the big ship never went to the bottom.

The sea where it sank is very deep, and the tremendous pressure from below, he thinks, kept the great liner afloat many fathoms down. Its great hull has probably floated hundreds of miles distant in the 11 years that have passed since the German submarine fired its fatal torpedo that sent so many women and children to a watery grave.—Capper's Weekly.

Nationality Vague

The birth of an eight-pound girl on a British steamship in American waters to an American mother, wife of a Rumanian resident of Buenos Aires, offered a problem to immigration officials and the mother. The child was born just as the Vestria, bound from South American ports to Hoboken, dropped anchor at quarantine, one day late because of extra cargoes. Mrs. Catherine Pitychuck had apparently lost the race to have her baby born an American citizen, for in the opinion of immigration officials the girl was a Rumanian, though only a Supreme court decision could determine that finally.

Preserve Beauregard Home

The home of Gen. P. G. T. Beauregard, distinguished Confederate officer, in New Orleans, will not become a macaroni factory. When a company was about to buy the ground on which the general's house stands for a factory, the Beauregard Memorial association agreed to buy it and a payment of $4,000 has bound the contract.

Ostrich Racing

Ostrich racing is a popular sport in Vienna and Rome. The ostriches are treated just like racehorses, and have trainers and jockeys. Their speed is amazing, often as much as 26 miles an hour, whilst even with two men on its back an ostrich has been known to run faster than a horse. The average length of their stride is 12 feet.

TAGGING ALL THE BASES

(L. N. S. Dispatch)

After handling nearly every previous chance poorly, Lester Bell waited until the ninth inning of the seventh game to come up cleanly with a pair. That boy knows how to pick his spots.

The Yanks weren't due to beat Alexander and they knew it. In fact, the thing was practically no secret at all.

The ticket speculators, it seems, were thrown for a loss behind their own goal line. It's getting more difficult every day to turn an honest dollar.

Baseball's big moments are all too few. When this determined Ruth strode to the plate with two outs in the ninth to face the serenely confident Alexander, every heart in the place was lifted right out of its socket and thrown away.

Alex didn't exactly pass Ruth with malice aforethought. He just didn't have any particular intention of giving George a good ball.

Of course, they have the losing manager on the pan this morning. Huggins was being toasted to a rich brown turn for ordering Koenig to sacrifice in the seventh and Ruth to run into the final out in the ninth.

They also are pleased to note, locally, that the Cards got what they term the "corks" and quote Koenig's fumble on Bell and Meuser's miff of O'Farrell's fly as evidence. I didn't know these were breaks; I thought they were, bad baseball.

The only real break the Cards got came when Haines injured his finger. It's always a break for the Cards when Alexander is pitching.

Ruth's fourth homer, breaking all records, sailed high and far to left center and barely made the grade into the bleachers, Holm giving the ball the good, old college try. He almost got his hands on it, at that. It was hit off one of those slow balls that are supposed to confound George but seldom do.

The better ball club won. It was a much better that it should have won in six games.

"ALL ABOARD"

A musical comedy, to be a genuine hit must possess two things, First a good interesting plot, and a tuneful musical score. Without these a show cannot be a real success, but in "All Aboard," the musical show which the Music Club is to stage at the Auditorium theatre on Oct. 21 and 22, will be found the above requirements and more. The above show which is from the pen of the late Junie McCree who wrote more than a hundred professional stage successes, proved to be one of the largest Broadway hits ever produced. Too much cannot be said of the pretty musical score, or of the charm which will be found in two of the numbers "My Dream Has at Last Come True" and "The Bashful Bumble Bee."

Some of those taking leading parts are Jack Berphill who will portray Billy Brady, a college boy, Richard Albery, will be seen as Johnny Thomas, Billy's pal. The part of Alexander C. Phome will be taken by Jack Sifford. Dorothy Brady and Beatrice Soane, two college girls will be played by Miss Mary Emily Dunham and Miss Helen Rhoades. Gertrude Livingston will be seen as the mother to Beatrice and Carrol Koon as Captain Kidd, on the S. S. Florida.

AMERICAN PRESIDENTS!

dent of the United States. When he was succeeded by Thomas Jefferson he moved out of the White House the night before March 4 and refused to ride to the Capitol with his successor, in the customary manner, or even welcome him to the White House. President Johnson refused to meet General Grant, it having come to his ears that General Grant had said he would not ride to the Capitol with Johnson. James Monroe was the originator of the custom of holding the inaugural ceremony on the east portico of the Capitol.

President Roosevelt was the champion-ship writer of American history. He wrote more than twice as many as President Cleveland, and it is said that the vocabulary that he employed embodied a greater range of words than were used by all his predecessors combined.

When Woodrow Wilson began writing addresses to Congress and notes to foreign powers, there was a reveal of attention to the literary merit of the utterances. Previously little attention had been paid to the literary aspects of these official papers. It was early realized that Mr. Wilson was a master of English, and scholars as well as politician began paying attention to what he produced. President Harding's messages were regarded as scholarly also and President Coolidge's proclamations are compared to Lincoln's as to simplicity and forcibly concise. President Wilson was one of the first Presidents of later times to write his messages entirely himself. He did not even dictate them but picked them out on a typewriter.

The literary merit of President McKinley's messages improved after John Hay became his ranking advisor and it has been no unusual thing for a President to resort to aid in the preparation of a message. Even Washington's Farewell Address is said by critics to show trace of the style of Alexander Hamilton. Also J. Pierpont Morgan has an original letter written by Washington to James Madison asking him to prepare the Farewell Address and containing an outline of what he wanted. One of the finest messages in the history of the Presidency, from a literary standpoint, is credited to Andrew Johnson who had fewer educational advantages than any other President. It is said he was unable to read or write until taught by his wife.

President Taft in six years of speech-making before and after becoming President, uttered nearly two million words in his public addresses and his successors, Wilson and Harding maintained about the same rate. These utterances are printed and put together into bound volumes.

One of the most interesting contacts of the President with the public is that through the Washington correspondents. These regular press conferences were inaugurated by Mr. Taft. Before his time the correspondents had interviews with the President when they were fortunate enough to get them. President Harding set the hours of 1 o'clock each Tuesday and 4 o'clock of each Friday as definite engagements for reception of accredited Washington correspondents. Care is taken to exclude masqueraders and curiosity seekers from joining the throng of one to two hundred newspaper men with assemblies. The correspondents, in advance, write out questions they desire to have the President answer. These tho in the President's hands when the correspondents are ushered in. He then answers them, or not, as he sees fit and makes and additional announcements he desires. The reason for the written question is that should the President desire to make no answer to some question only the man who wrote the question will be aware of the fact. So the newspapers are the principal point of contact between the people and the man that the people have elected President of the greatest country in the world.

The Patience of Patricia

By RUBY DOUGLAS

(Copyright)

"HOW did they happen to call you Patricia?" asked big Tom Singleton of his lovely companion, Patricia Reese.

"For two reasons," she replied mysteriously.

"The first, I suppose even in your basinet you had a patrician air," he taunted.

The girl laughed a delightful ripple. "No—that was not one of the reasons, true it might have been."

"What then?"

"My grandfather—whose first grandchild I was—was named Patrick."

"Yes," the man said.

"And—I was born on the seventh day of March, St. Patrick's day in the morning," she replied, lightly.

"Reason enough—I'm satisfied. But I insist that my guess is the best reason of the three."

"For which—thank you," murmured Patricia.

This was the frivolous conversation that had been a part of their early acquaintance. Now, after three years of more than friendship Patricia was beginning to wonder whether or not it would have been better if their acquaintance never had become more intimate than it was in those playful days. She had been engaged to Tom for two years and she was afraid to marry him. That she loved him, she never doubted for an instant, but that she would never have the patience and courage and endurance to teach him to control a temper that had been allowed to grow wilder and more unreasonably destructive with each of his formative years, she doubted. It was the only reason she had not married him before now. She was fearful lest, once married, he would cease to make the effort to overcome his violent disposition. What the waiting amounted to, really, Patricia had often told herself, was a season of probation. In which they could both learn whether or not they cared enough to strive—and overcome it together.

"I'm paying an awful penalty for my temper, Pat," Tom said to her one day in a season of remorse after an unreasonable outburst.

Patricia was silent. It never occurred to him that she, too, might be suffering. Perhaps she would have liked the comfort, pleasure and security of a little home of her own with the man she loved.

"I suppose I have set myself back fairly that ever now," he asked.

Patricia looked at him with the same level, kindly understanding expression in her eyes that she always wore on these occasions. Sometimes she wondered at her own patience to forgive him. And yet—in her heart—she knew he was not wholly to blame for the hold this temper had on him before he was old enough to think for himself. She had known other members of his family.

"No, Tom, I really believe you have made great progress in two years. You try—and you frequently succeed. That's improvement, isn't it?"

He nodded, muttering ruefully, "Some—I suppose."

"If I said I would marry you if you could be good until—well, say until my birthday? Would that be any encouragement?"

"Patricia!" they man cried, leaping almost across the room to seize her hand. "It's what I need—assurance that you really will marry me some day—or all!"

"All right then, Tom, we will leave it that way. We have our lives to live. We want to live them together—and I'm getting tired—and lonely, myself—waiting—and forgiving. Wouldn't you like to make love to me for me, dear?" she asked, a plaintive note in her voice that he had never heard there before.

The next morning came with its vivid accessories and Tom and Patricia were invited to a party with a group of young people they had known for years.

A cold March wind had blown up during the day and the thermometer was dropping fast.

There had been signs of spring and winter preparations had been done away with, even to the elimination of antifreeze fluid in the radiator of Tom's little car.

When the dance was over and Tom and Patricia came out to go home, the motor would not start. It had chosen this day in its last hour to freeze!

Tom tried every wile he knew of to induce the car to go, but it would not. Even in the dim light from the dash Patricia could see symptoms of his rising temper, his red face, his narrowed eyes, his quick breathing, his sharp movements and tone.

There was nearly a half hour of infinite patience on her part and her heroic effort at control on his before the means of getting home was finally decided upon.

At last, Patricia won and they permitted themselves to be towed to a garage some three miles distant.

Meantime, Tom had remembered what it would cost him to lose his temper—and, he, too, had won the battle.

"One month from tonight, then," were his last words to her.

"Yes, dear, one whole long month—and we'll be married," whispered Patricia. "I'm not afraid."

Selenium in Small Demand

Selenium is an element and not found native in visible quantity. It is obtained as a by-product in the electrolytic refining of copper. It is used in making red glass, electric resistances and cells for measuring light. These cells are particularly sensitive to light and many of them come under Swedish patents. The present supply of selenium is greater than the demand and it has no great commercial value.
