It is the hope of Air Service officials that Goddard will have opportunities to demonstrate the worth of the advanced ideas in aeronautical engineering for which he has played such an important part in the preliminary work.

Following the development of the cameras, and later the small film cameras, the improved films, dates were fixed a number of times for the unique experiments. Weather conditions interfered, and prevented the pre-arranged schedule.

Goddard is in control 20,000 feet in the high altitude ship built especially for him in 1932 by John A. Macready and there operates his ship, with the camera pointed toward Detroit 700 miles distant.

Some time ago, an Air Service photographer made a picture at a distance of 10 miles and it was the sensation in the entire photographic world.

Within the last year Lieutenant Goddard and Dr. E. M. Beckur, doctor of philosophy at John Hopkins, developed a flash light cartridge for use at night and in war problems, which range all sizes as far as proposition and which is so powerful that the 60 pound flash bombs is exploded simultaneously by means of an incendiary and acetylene firing system which is contained on the cartridge.

Previous to this development flash bombs were inefficient, due to the lack of power in the explosion. The new development works automatically and the flash into effect 20 seconds after it is dropped from the atmosphere of the airplane.

Following successful experiments the inventor and his colleague Smith were obtained at high altitude in light photography the war department found orders starting down upon many of the details of the new and the experimental work indicating that important work had been done three of more than extraordinary military values.
